

Getting Started

Why do I procrastinate?

6 reasons that aren't laziness, and one small, kind fix for each.

1

Step 1

The task stirs up a bad feeling

Delay gives quick relief from dread, worry or boredom. Often the problem is the feeling, not the task itself.

★ Name the feeling, then promise just two minutes.

2

Step 2

It's boring or unpleasant

Your brain picks something more rewarding. That is normal. Make the dull task a little more fun.

★ Try a playlist, a timer race or a small treat.

3

Step 3

There's no clear first step

A fuzzy goal like "sort the garage" is easy to skip. Turn it into one tiny action you could do in five minutes.

★ Open the doc and type a heading. That counts.

4

Step 4

The payoff is far away

The effort is right now and the reward is weeks off, so today loses. Bring the reward closer.

★ Set a mini deadline for this afternoon.

5

Step 5

You fear it won't be good enough

Perfectionism and self doubt often hide behind delay. Being kinder to yourself about past delays tends to help.

★ Make a rough first version on purpose.

6

Step 6

Your brain handles time differently

Trouble with planning, attention or judging time, common with ADHD, can make starting harder. Outside supports help.

★ Try a visible timer and a check in buddy.

You are not lazy

Name your reason, then make the first step smaller. One small start is enough for today.

Save this for later

Full guide: link in bio